Dear Mr. Wirth, Mr. Woods, Mr. Lance, and Mr. Lawler:

President Trump has put U.S. oil companies at the center of his escalating interventions in Venezuela. On January 3, 2026, just hours after the U.S. military operation capturing Venezuela’s president, Nicolás Maduro, was carried out absent congressional authorization, President Trump stated that U.S. oil companies would “go in” to Venezuela “to take out money,” “take back the oil,” and be “reimbursed for what [you’re] doing.”¹ He also stated that “we’re gonna have a presence in Venezuela as pertains to oil” and that “we’re gonna be taking out a tremendous amount wealth out of the ground.”² Oversight Committee Democrats are investigating any corrupt motives for private or personal gain that may be driving the Trump Administration’s decision to put American lives at risk to seize control of a sovereign nation’s natural resources.

The President’s comments came as a surprise to the American people, but perhaps not to your executives. Reportedly, President Trump had privately told oil companies to “get ready” for political changes in Venezuela approximately one month before the rendition operation.³ Congress and the American public had no comparable notice. Additionally, at least ten days before the raid, Administration officials had reportedly told companies, “you gotta go in [to Venezuela] if you want to play and get reimbursed,” according to one industry official.⁴ During a recent discussion with reporters on Air Force One, the President appeared to confirm that he had spoken to “all” oil companies before the raid on Venezuelan soil.⁵ These statements contradict other public reporting, including reference to sources at U.S. oil companies that claimed they did not have contact with the White House either before or after the rendition of President Maduro.⁶

Previous reports have demonstrated the close relationship between the Trump Administration and oil companies. On May 9, 2024, the Washington Post reported that former President Trump had convened about two dozen oil executives at Mar-a-Lago, promising favorable policies in exchange for $1 billion in campaign contributions.⁵ Fossil fuel industry interests have contributed heavily to President Trump and have benefitted tens of billions of dollars as a result of President Trump’s policy changes.⁷ Now, oil companies reportedly want the Trump Administration to provide “boots-on-the-ground security and some financial security” in Venezuela.⁸ Oil company executives are reportedly scheduled to meet at the White House today to discuss plans for Venezuela with President Trump and cabinet officials.⁹

Venezuelan Vice President Delcy Rodríguez, who has assumed de jure leadership over the country in Maduro’s absence, previously directed Venezuela’s state-owned oil company to
