Thanks for your email. I'll come back to you in more detail, but I thought you should be aware of the fact that in the case of ALEC, we have twice organized sessions to provide our position in support of a carbon tax to the state legislators who make up the organization.

Hello Alan,

Happy New Year, I hope you had a nice holiday.

I'm working on a story based on some research NextGen Climate shared with me that shows Exxon contributed roughly $4.1 million since 2008 to groups that deny the role of burning fossil fuels in climate change. These groups include: AEI, ALEC, Pacific Legal Foundation, George C. Marshall Institute, and the Federalist Society.

I know we've spoken before about Exxon's role in funding groups that it may not agree with on every point, but surely climate issues are core to the company's mission and purpose.

Does Exxon encourage these groups to align their positions on climate change with Exxon's view, that it is happening and humans' have a role in it?
